Just on the edge of Salamanca's old town, the Hotel Rector, a honey-colored 14-room stone townhouse, could teach many grander addresses a lesson or two. The welcome here was so warm it was almost disarming; our suitcases disappeared upstairs in a flash; and the lovely woman at the front desk immediately equipped us with a walking map and a helpful pamphlet on Salamanca's most important sites.

After enduring so many gild-the-lily excesses over the last decade, it was a delight to be in such an attractive, well-run old-fashioned hotel. We only spent a night at the Rector, but quickly felt at home in our comfortable double room with powder-blue wall-to-wall carpeting and delicate crown moldings. Cozy cotton blankets worked a charm for a siesta, and the ice-colored marble bath, paneled with large sheets of beautifully grained stone, was immaculate and well-lit. The separate tub and shower were stocked with Bulgari toiletries. Rooms facing the street have partial views of the cathedral, which is beautifully illuminated at night.
